marle, whose "Recollections" have just been published, was in his youth a playfellow of the Princess Charlotte. On one winter day his grandmother proposed to take him to the play, of which he was very fond. "I told the Princess," he says, "of the pleasure I had in prospect, and of my readiness to incur the almost inevitable penalty attached to that pleasure-a good flogging the following morning. From this, as I told her Royal Highness, there was no escape, for how was it possible after the play and a good supper to be in time for the 8 o'clock morning school? 'Leave that to me,' said the Princess, and forthwith penned a letter to Dr. Page, taking upon herself the blame for my anticipated non-appearance. The morning after the play I came into school half an hour late, and was 'shown up' as a matter of course. With a deprecatory 'Please, sir,' I presented my royal credentials. The Doctor glanced at the seal and the hieroglyphic 'Charlotte' on the envelope, and then dropped the letter into the pocket of his gown that his hand might be free to grasp the rod. His next proceeding was to perform that part of his duty which always seemed a pleasure. That done, he read the letter to the whole form, and added how glad he was that he had not opened it sooner, for he would have been under the painful necessity of disobeying her Royal Highness's commands." An Irish judge said, when addressing a prisoner, "You are to be hanged, and I hope it will prove a warning to you." DRY GOODS.
